On 16-10-1942 two notifications Nos.134 and 135 proscribing two different publications were issued. The amendment suggested in this office Notification No.145, dated 19-11-1942 was in respect of Notification No.134, dated 16-10-42. But the P.M.G. presumes that the amendment relates to Notification No.135 of the same date. His presumption is correct since there has been interchange of numbers in the fair copies of the notifications issued on 16-10-42.

Copy of letter dated March 21, 1938, from the Director, Begg, Sutherland & Co. Ltd., Cawnpore to the Secretary to Government, United Provinces, Agricultural department, Lucknow.

In accordance with the Notification Nos. 1516./XIII.-145(2), 1556./XIII.-203 and 1442./XIII.-145(U) dated 10th March 1938, regarding applications from the JaiLakshmi Sugar Company Ltd., Prag Sugar Works and Messrs. Indra Singh & Sons Ltd., for the grant of license to extend the capacity of their respective Factories, we wish to place on record our objections to extension licenses being granted to these Concerns. As your Government are aware the potential productive capacity of the existing Factories in India is now considerably in excess of the consumptive White Sugar requirements of the country. We must therefore protest most strongly against licenses for the purpose of increasing capacity being granted to the Factories concerned. With the saturation point having been reached some two years ago and the policy of Indian States to encourage the Sugar Industry within the confines of their territories it would be suicidal to countenance further extensions at a time when the Industry is endeavouring to combat the very serious problem of overproduction.

We would suggest that the Sugar Control Board call for figures confidentially from the Director, Imperial Institute of Sugar Technology, regarding the existing capacities of the Factories concerned to ascertain whether they have actually been crushing up to these capacities It is possible that the reason for making these applications is due to the increasing development in the cane areas of the Factories concerned, and if so, the position should not be viewed from purely a local outlook. We would greatly appreciate if you would see that the points we have raised are borne in mind when applications for license are .....

In its Annual number for 1944 the Adab-i-Latif (Lahore), printed by Chaudhri Barkat Ali at the Din Muhammadi Press, Lahore, and published by him from the office of the Magazine, situate outside Mori Gate, Lahore, publishes articles headed "Adab-i-Jadid" (Modern Literature) and "Bu" (Smell) by Saadat Hasan Minto. Some noticeable portions may be translated as under :—

(a) Adab-i-Jadid

Ever since the commencement of war an attack is being made on modern literature from a new angle. It is said when the whole world is engulfed by the flames of war, the blood of thousands of human beings is daily mixing with dust, death has taken the form of wine in every cup and like other commodities shops of human flesh and skin are also opened, why the modern writers are silent. Do their pens dip in the sex ink only ? The map of the world is changing. Every moment and every hour is bringing the message of new storm but their hearts and brains are obsessed with an irremovable stagnation. I will not reply on behalf of others. I want to say about myself that the map of the world is really changing but if I ever wrote about it my own appearance would also change. I am a timid fellow and am very much afraid of jail. The life I am leading is no less troublesome than jail. If a jail is created within this jail and I am thrust into it, I shall breathe my last in no time. I love life and am fond of action. I can receive bullet in my chest while walking and going about, but do not want to die the death of a bed-bug in jail. Here while reading out this article on this platform, I shall allow myself to be beaten by you all without raising any cry, but if in a Hindu-Muslim riot someone breaks my head, every drop of my blood will remain weeping. I am an artist and dislike unfair and ugly wounds. Should I write something about war and die in some dark and dingy cell with the desire of seeing and touching the pistol, suppressed in my heart ? It is better than such death that I should give up writing and open some dairy farm and begin selling milk mixed with water. I shall not write anything about this war. Not to speak of shells and torpedoes, I have not even fired an air-gun so far. During my childhood there used to live in our neighbourhood a Sub-Inspector of Police. He had a pistol. When on removing his belt he placed it on the bedstead, all children were warned not to go into that room as there was lying the pistol—Sometimes we frightfully went into that room and even on sighting that dangerous weapon from a distance, our heart began to sink with terror. We felt as if the pistol would go off in its lying state—Now pray tell as to what my friends and I shall write about the war of guns and tanks—I am not fond of wearing a tight uniform nor have I any interest in brass and copper medals and coloured badges of cloth. I do not want to assist in war effort by dancing in hotels, by drinking liquor in clubs and roaring about in taxis along with girls having painted lips and cheeks.—I enjoy far more interesting hobbies than this—For example, is it anywise a bad hobby that I daily see in electric trams running from Bombay Central to Goure Gaon and vice versa, hundreds of uniformed soldiers who in order to bring victory and conquest still nearer, are seen either heavily intoxicated with liquor or sleeping with outstretched legs or forgetful of my presence are busy contracting the most-absurd kind of romance with the ugliest women. I shall write nothing about the war, but when there is a pistol in my hand and the fear that it will go off automatically vanishes from my heart, I shall go out waving it and on recognising my real enemy I shall either fire all the bullets into his chest—or get myself perforated. On this death when any critic of mine would say that I was a madman my soul would pick up these words considering them to be the biggest medal and hang it on my chest.

(b) "Bu" (Smell)

It were these very days of rainy season. Outside the window leaves of pipal trees were bathing themselves in the same way. A Ghatin* lass was clinging to Randhir on the springed bedstead of Teak which was now pushed a bit hither from the window.

*Ghati is the name of a class of menials and a female member of the tribe is called Ghatin—Tr.

Outside the window leaves of pipal were trembling like ear-rings in the milky darkness and were taking a bath. And the (said) Ghatin girl was clinging to Randhir, quivering and shivering. After reading all the news and advertisements in an English paper when he was standing in the balcony for a little recreation in the evening, he by coughing and hemming had drawn towards himself the attention of this Ghatin girl who was probably working in the rope-manufacturing factory close by and had taken her stand under the tamarind tree with a view to saving herself from the rain and at last he called her upstairs by the gesture of his hand.

He was feeling acute loneliness for several days past. Due to war almost all the Christian girls, of Bombay, who could be had previously at cheap rates, had enrolled themselves in the Women's Auxiliary Force. Some of them had opened in the fort area dancing schools where only British soldiers were allowed to go—Randhir had become very sad. One cause of his sadness was that Christian girls had become rare and the other cause was also this that in spite of his being far more civilized, educated, heal hy and handsome than British soldiers, the doors of most of the brothels of the Fort were closed on him, simply because his skin was not white.

Before war Randhir had had physical meetings with several Christian girls of the neighbourhood of Nagpara and Taj Hotel. He knew it well that he possessed far greater knowledge of the etiquette of such meetings than those Christian boys with whom these girls carried on romance out of fashion and later on married some blockhead (lit : owl).

Merely to take revenge in his innermost heart from Hazelle Becket for her newly-developed arrogance, Randhir had called up that Ghatin girl by a gesture. Hazelle Becket used to live under his flat and every morning used to come out wearing uniform and a cap of Khaki colour obliquely placed on her bobbed hair and walked with such an air as if all pedestrians on the footpath would lay themselves at her feet like a mat.

Randhir had thought why after all he was so much inclined to these Christian girls. No doubt they make a display of all the exhibitable things of their body in a nice way and make mention of the irregularity of their menses without feeling any hesitation of any kind They narrate accounts of their old amorous pursuits. When they hear the tune of dance they begin to move their legs as if dancing. Lie with them and (you will feel) the same ease which is felt at the time of taking patent medicines because the paper containing instructions for use is there and over and above this there is no danger of Hindu-Muslim riot, and no fear of mosque-temple clash. This is all true, but some other woman also can be the embodiment of all these qualities.

When Randhir had called the Ghatin girl up by a gesture, he did not at all believe that he would cause her to sleep with him, but shortly afterwards when on seeing her wet clothes he thought lest the poor girl should catch Pneumonia, he said to her " Take off these clothes (or) you will catch cold ".

She had understood his meaning ; because out of modesty red streaks had run through (lit. were floating in) her eyes, but later on when Randhir gave her his white Dhoti, she, after a little pause undid her " Kashta " (apparel used by a woman for covering lower part of her body), dirt from which had oozed out for reason of its having become wet. Having untied her " Kashta ", she placed it aside and quickly placed the white Dhoti over her thighs. Then she began to make effort for taking off her tightened jacket, by joining the two edges of which she had tied a knot. This knot had almost sunk in the tiny but dirty pit of her healthy chest.

For long with the help of her abraded nails she went on trying to untie the jacket's knot which had become all the more tightened with rain water. Tired and baffled in her effort she said something to Randhir in Marhatti purporting to mean : " What should I do, it cannot be untied ".

Randhir sat beside her and began to untie the knot. Tired and baffled he caught one end of the jacket in one hand and the other end in the other hand and pulled the latter with force. The knot became loosened at once. Randhir's hands, in violence, fell hither and thither (and) two throbbing breasts became apparent. Randhir for a moment thought that like a skilful potter his own hands had formed on the chest of that Ghatin girl two cups with soft and kneaded clay.

In her healthful breasts there was the same ripeness, attractiveness, freshness and warm coolness which is to be found in unbaked utensils freshly manufactured by the potter's hands.

There was a strange sort of lustre in these youthful breasts of dark colour which were quite stainless. Below the skin of darkish wheat complexion there was a sort of layer of dim light. This had created a strange lustre which was not lustre despite its being lustre. These risings of breasts on her chest looked like earthen lamps burning in the dirty water of a tank.

It were these very days of rainy season (and) outside the window pipal leaves were likewise quivering. Both the garments of the (aforesaid) Ghatin girl sodden with water were lying on the floor in the form of a dirty heap and she was clinging to Randhir. The heat of her naked and dirty body was creating in the body of Randhir the condition which is felt at the time of taking a bath in the dirty but hot baths of barbers in extreme cold.

She remained clung to Randhir the whole night (and it appeared) as if both had merged into each other. They hardly spoke a word or two, because what they had to say or hear was being settled through breaths, lips and hands. Randhir's hands continued to travel the whole night on her breasts like the touch of air. The small nipples and the big pores which were spread round them in the form of a black circle, would wake even by this airy touch and create such a sensation in the entire body of that Ghatin girl, that even Randhir himself would shiver for a moment.

Randhir had experienced such shiverings hundreds of times (and) he was fully aware of their delight. He had passed such nights, keeping his chest in contact with soft and hard breasts of several girls. He had even passed them (lit. lived) with such girls as were totally raw and who, while lying with him, used to tell him all the home (? family) affairs which ought not to be told to a stranger. He had also established physical connection with such girls as used to do the whole labour themselves and gave him no trouble. But this Ghatin girl who was standing drenched under a tamarind tree, and whom he had called upstairs by a gesture was very different.

The whole night Randhir continued to get a strange sort of smell from her body. He continued to drink, the whole night, this smell, which was good and bad at one and the same time. Every breath of Randhir contained this smell, which was bad as well as good, which emitted from her armpits, breasts, hair, belly and every other part (lit. place) (of her body). All the night he went on thinking that in spite of being too near (to him) that Ghatin girl would on no account have been so close (to him) had this smell not emanated from her naked body.—This smell had crept into every fold of his heart and brain had permeated all his old and new thoughts.

This smell had for one night dissolved Randhir and this girl into each other, both of them had entered into each other and had descended into the deepest depths, reaching where they had turned into a purely human pleasure—a pleasure which, despite being momentary, was permanent and which, in spite of its being inclined to flight, was stationary and static. Both of them had become a bird, which while soaring high into the azures—of sky, looks motionless.

Randhir very well understood the smell which was emanating from every pore of that Ghatin girl, although he could not analyse it. Just as sometimes fragrance, smelling like new earth, arises on sprinkling water on clay.....but no, that smell was of quite a different kind. It did not contain the artificiality of lavindar and scent. It was quite real—real and eternal like the mutual relations of man ant woman.

Randhir badly hated the smell of perspiration and after taking bath he generally applied fragrant powder to his armpits, etc. (and) used some such medicine as would suppress the smell of sweat. But it is surprising that h several times—yes several times, kissed the armpits of that Ghatin girl, overgrown with hair and he felt no odium at all ; on the other hand he perceived a strange sort of pleasure. Soft hair of her armpits had become wet owing to perspiration. They, too, emitted the same smell which despite being extremely conceivable, was inconceivable. Randhir felt as if he knew, recognised and even understood the meaning of that smell but he could not explain it to any one else.

It were these days of rainy season.....this was the window peeping through which he had seen that the leaves of pipal were tremblingly taking a bath. Rustles and flutters were commingled in the air. (Though) it was dark yet there was dim and faint light therein, as if little light of the stars had come down by coming into contact with the drops of rain. It were these very rainy days when there used to be only one cot of teak wood in this room of Randhir, but now along with this was lying another one also and in the corner there was also a new dressing table. It were these very days of rainy season. The weather, too, was exactly the same. Little light of stars was also descending along with the drops of rain but the air (lit. atmosphere) was rich with strong fragrance of myrtle scent.

The other cot was vacant. On this cot lying on which Randhir, with his face downwards, was watching outside the window the dance of rain drops on the shivering leaves of pipal, there had probably gone to sleep a fair-coloured girl while making an abortive attempt at concealing her private parts by means of her naked body. Her red silk trousers were lying on the other cot. A tussel of her dark red trousers' string was hanging down. On this cot were also lying her other clothes taken off (her body). Her shirt with golden flowers, whose colour was as red as that of trousers, covering for the breasts (gussets), shorts, and scarf were all of red colour, deep red. All of these clothes were soaked in strong myrtle scent.

Particles of brocade were sticking to the black hair of the girl like dust. The rouge on face, lipstick and these particles of brocade had combinedly created a strange sort of colour, lifeless and somewhat faded. And the not fast colour of her breast-covering had caused red stains here and there on her white chest.

The breasts were white like milk in which there exists light bluishness. Hair in the armpits were shaven as a result of which an antimony-like layer (lit. fog) had appeared there. By looking at this girl several times Randhir had thought : " Does it not so appear as if I have taken her, like books and crockery, out of a closed wooden box by driving out the nails just now," because just as marks of pressure appear on books and scratches appear on crockery goods when being moved, exactly like them there were marks at several places on the body of this girl.

When Randhir had untied the strings of her tightly fitted gussets, there were found marks like wrinkles on the back and over-soft flesh of her breast in front and there was also a mark of tightly-tied trousers string around her waist. Owing to the weighty and pointed bejewelled necklace there had appeared scratches at several places on her breast as if it (breast) had been violently itched with nails. Same were the rainy days. As a result of the dropping of rain drops over soft leaflets of pipal the same sound was being produced as Randhir had been hearing throughout the night on that day. The weather was very pleasant, cool breeze was blowing but in this was dissolved strong fragrance of myrtle scent.

Randhir's hands kept moving like an air touch, over the unboiled milklike white chest of the fair-coloured girl. His fingers felt several tremors running in her white body. He had even discerned shrivelled shiverings in several corners of her soft body. When he brought his chest in contact with her breast, every pore of Randhir's body heard the sound of the tunes struck by that girl—But where was that call, the call which he had smelt from the smell of the body of that Ghatin girl—the call which was far more conceivable than the weeping of the babe thirsty for milk—the call which having passed from the limits of sound had become a unnameable fragrance.

REVIEW

The book entitled "Arya Satyagraha" by Satyadev Vidyalankar is a treatise on the Satyagraha movement launched in Hyderabad State by the Sarvdeshik Arya Pratinidhi Sabha (International Aryan League) in the year 1939. It describes in detail the then prevailing conditions of the Hindus in Hyderabad State, and the progress of the Satyagraha movement.

In the first chapter the author criticises the policy of the Government of India in thrusting upon Indian States retired officers of the British Government and asserts that in Muslim States, particularly in Hyderabad, such Muslim officers nourish a feeling of hatred and animosity towards the Arya Samaj.

The author accuses Hyderabad State for the gross injustice done to the Hindus in refusing them permission to construct or repair temples, Dharamshalas and Havan-kunds. He strongly condemns the policy of Hyderabad State in trying to separate the Harijans from the Hindus and converting them to Islam. Discussing the educational policy of the State he alleges that all scholarships, advances and other facilities for education in foreign countries are given only to Muslim candidates and the Hindus are deprived of them on one pretext or the other. More money is spent on the religious education of Muslims than on that of the Hindus. Urdu being the court language many non-muslim students are forced to read it simply to secure State services. Hindu students are rusticated from the University for singing Bandematram. He criticises the policy of the state of giving preference to non-Hindus in services and says that, though Hindus form about 85% of the total population, their representation in the State services is quite negligible. He quotes several instances of atrocities perpetrated on Arya Samajists in which they were not allowed to take out processions, deliver speeches and preach peacefully in urban and rural areas.

In the second chapter the author narrates in detail the proceedings of the Sholapur conference held on the 25th, 26th and 27th December 1938 in which it was decided to launch the Satyagraha Movement in Hyderabad State under the leadership of Narain Swami.

In the third and fourth chapters he gives the names of Satyagrahis, with brief life sketches of some of them.

In the fifth chapter the author condemns the inhuman treatment meted out to Satyagrahi prisoners in State jails. He quotes instances when there were disturbances inside the jails and the prisoners were given severe beating as a result of which about 15 of them lost their lives.

In the sixth chapter the author blames the Nizam Government for placing obstacles in the way of Satyagraha Movement and alleges that the State was responsible for making the Muslims consider that the movement was "an attack by outsiders on the Muslim fortress". The author further states that Indian States and British Provinces, particularly the Punjab, rendered assistance to the Hyderabad State in combating this movement. According to him the state refused to look into the grievances of the Hindus and encouraged by the attitude of the State the Muslims committed the murders of several Arya Samajists. In this chapter the author also relates the excesses of the State police.

In the 7th chapter the author gives the resounding effect of the movement in England and mentions that Col. Wedgewood Ben and other M.P's raised this issue in the Parliament and the Manchester Guardian and other papers discussed the policy of the Nizam Government.

In the 8th chapter he describes the enthusiasm evinced by the Arya Samajists in different parts of India and South Africa and mentions the amount of subscription collected from various Districts and Provinces.

In the 9th and 10 chapters he asserts that this Satyagraha had become such a nuisance to the Nizam Government that it was only too keen to end it.

In the 11th chapter he quotes the opinions expressed by newspapers and certain leaders, including Pt. Jawahar Lal Nehru, Mahatma Gandhi and Dr. Rajinder Prashad in regard to this movement; these leaders had blamed the Nizam Government for crushing the civil rights of its subjects.

In the last chapter the author accuses the Nizam Government for inciting the Muslims of the State and falsely implicating the Hindu Mahasabha, the Congress and Mr. Gandhi with the Satyagraha movement. He also criticises the two books alleged to have been published at the instance of the Nizam Government against this movement. Concluding the author says that although the State does not accept its defeat all the same this is a grand success for Arya Samaj and its prestige and honour has not only been enhanced in Hyderabad State but in the entire country

Summary of the book 'Shahri Azadi

The book 'Civil Liberty' by Dr.Ram Manohar Lohiya was published in Urdu by the Maktaba-i-Jamia. The foreword is written by Pt.Jawahar Lal Nehru who in explaining the object of the book, stated 'there is nothing to be surprised at the unusual interest evinced by the people in the 'Civil Liberties' movement as it is being so ruthlessly suppressed here that the public is at its wits end to know what to do. As it is a common misfortune, it is our duty-sheerly in self defence to be united in facing this tyranny'. Proceeding he expressed the hope that the book would be read extensively "as it would give a impetus to the movement of Civil Liberties and every one of us would be able to resist better the persistent efforts made by Government to restrain our freedom".

Of the five chapters in the book three have been devoted to the tracing of the development of Civil Liberties movement in France, America and England. In the first two countries, it is alleged, that the high-handedness of the executive had increased to such an extent and the tyranny perpetrated on the common people was so universal that people had to join hands for safeguarding their rights, privileges and liberty and with that end in view established 'Civil Liberties Unions' in various parts of the country. The object of these Unions was to expose the highhandedness of the officials - police and other executive - from the platform, the press and in the courts of law. In England though the people are traditionally freedom-loving instances were not wanting when individual interests and specially those of the poor and middle class people, were not sacrificed for the benefit of a few. The Civil Liberties' movement found a congenial soil in this country and at present instances of flagrant and wanton harrassment of the people are rare.

Chapter four explains the concept of 'Civil Liberties'. According to the writer it includes individual liberty, liberty of movement and profession and liberty of thought and speech. "It is the primary duty of every Government to safeguard the natural rights of a man which consist of his personal freedom, law and order and protection from tyranny. "Tracing the history of the movement in India it is stated that it began with the Ilbert Bill which was introduced with a view to abolish discrimination between the English and the Indians. The movement became popular soon. But after the war the Rowlatt Act was introduced which brought about the Jillianwala incident when people were made to crawl on their stomach. Since then, scarcely a year has passed when the Government has not promulgated one Act or the other for restraining the legitimate rights and liberty of the people. The laws in force are generally ambiguous and are enforced more rigorously than contemplated by their authors. Freedom of thought and speech are misconstrued for efforts to bring Government into hatred and contempt, the interpretation of these laws is vested in the executive who award exemplary punishments for even trivial offences. Section 107 is made use of for preventing associations of people in rural areas and section 144 is freely exercised under the guise of maintaining 'law and order'. When even the ordinary civil law is so drastic it is not difficult to guess what the 'emergency' laws would be like. In certain provinces personal liberty and safety of residence, liberty of movement and association are virtually non-existent. Cases of detention without trial, internment and transportation are common in the Punjab and Bengal. Everywhere the police has been invested with arbitrary powers. They can arrest, search, and detain anybody, on mere suspicion. All books and literature dealing with the national movement are summarily proscribed. Labour is not free to declare strikes. Observance of hartals for political purposes is forbidden. Trade Unions are declared unlawful institutions.

The powers vested in the police under the Public Security Act in Bengal serve as a steam roller in crushing all political associations and institutions. In rural areas meetings are banned and dispersed forcibly, people there are treated more inhumanly. Taxes are very heavy and bear no proportion to individual income. 'Public Safety' is an excuse often made use of in depriving self-respecting people of their personal rights, privileges and liberty.

That the Government would voluntarily modify its policy of harrassment and persecution is out of the question. Administration is bound to be carried on here through the aid of the 'Police' only. India is passing through a dark period of persecution and torture." Concluding the author exhorts all and one to join the Indian Civil Liberties movement.
